TUESDAY EVENING, AUGUST 27.

BURIAL OF A FREE-THINKER.-Horace Seaver, the free thinker, was buried at Forest Cemetery, Boston, Sunday afternoon, and only a few friends saw the sod placed over the coffin. Col. Robert G. Ingersoll, the lifelong friend and associate of Mr Seaver, said 'Good by" as the last sod was placed on the grave. This was all the coremony at the grave. At Paine Memorial Hall, however, there was a great crush of the deceased man's friends to hear Col. Ingereoll's eulogy. He referred to Mr. Seaver as a pioneer and toiler who had fallen ssleep at the end of his task. "Horace Seaver," said Mr. Ingersoll, "followed the light of his brain, the impulse of his heart. The religion of his day filled his heart with horror. He was kind, compassionate, and tender, and could not fall upon his knees be fore a cruel and revengeful God. He could not bow to one who slew with famine, sword, and fire, and Jehovah had no attriute that he could love. He attacked the creed of New Eng and, a religion that had a monster for a God, a religion whose dogmas would have shocked cannibals feasting mas would have shocked cannot seeking upon babes. The man had that superbibling which we call moral courage, courge in its highest form. He knew that his thoughts were not the thoughts of others, that he was with the few, and where one would take his side thousands would be his eager foes. He believed in the religion of freethought and good deeds, in a religion freethought and good deeds, in a religion for every day. He lived for this world. If there be another, he will live for that. He did what he could for the destruc-tion of fear, the destruction of the imaginary monster who rewards the few in beaven, the monster who tortures the many in perdition. How little, after all, we know of what is ill or well. How little of this wondrons stream of cataracts and polis, this stream of life that rises in a world un known and flows to that mysterious sea whose shore the foot of one who comes bath never pressed! How little of this life we know, this struggling ray of light 'twix gleam and gloom, this strip of land by ver dive clad between the unknown waster, this throbbing moment filled with love and pain, this dream that lies between the shadowy shores of sleep and death. We stand upon this verge of crumbling time, and we love, we hope, we disappear. Again we mingle with the dust, and the 'khot intrinsicate' forever falls apart." Several times Mr. Ingersoll was interrupted by the ap-
